Illustration of White Bryony tendrils from 'The Movements and Habits of Climbing Plants' (1882)

White Bryony tendrils

Darwin studied the movements and habits of climbing plants in the surrounding landscape around his home and within his own estate

'The totality of Darwin's world view can still be appreciated in the patterns of hills and valleys, hedgerows and woods. What a great thing it would be to preserve the outcome of his vision in all its complexity and compass.'

Professor Richard Fortey FRS

Formerly of Department of Palaeontology, Natural History Museum, author of 'Life, an Unauthorised Biography' (1997) and 'Trilobite' (2001).
